

Knowledge about the diagnosis

Now that your child has received a diagnosis, you'll probably have many questions about what it means and what to do.

Research suggests that seeking information can be a positive strategy and coping mechanism for parents<sup>1,2</sup>. Gathering information can help you:

- Understand your child's diagnosis and how to manage it
- Find out more about your child's behaviours so you understand what they're thinking and feeling
- Explain your child's diagnosis, needs and behaviours to others

One parent describes researching their child's diagnosis:

"I automatically went to a reputable website and they've got videos, so I found that really useful. I didn't get too carried away with my research, but we did some research."<sup>1</sup>

Things you may want to learn more about:

- What does the diagnosis mean for my child?
- What are the early intervention options?
- What supports and resources are available?

You can gather information on your child's specific disability or diagnosis by:

- Reading books and articles
- Gathering information from reputable websites
- Attending workshops or conferences in your area
- Speaking with health professionals and researchers

You can find some helpful resources to start your research at the end of this factsheet.

Important things to remember

Information isn't always reliable

While there is a lot of information available, not all of it is reliable and evidence-based. There are many controversial therapies that may claim to cure your child. Ensure you are looking at parent resources from organisations with a good reputation and that the interventions you are considering are supported by evidence<sup>3</sup>. You should discuss the information you find with the health professionals involved in your child's care.

Find a balance

Although doing research about your child's diagnosis can serve as a positive coping strategy, it's important to find a balance between gathering information and taking time for yourself<sup>3,4</sup>. If you don't step back from your research from time to time, you may find yourself becoming overwhelmed with the amount of information out there.
